The University of Virginia.
The paradox that one-half of the American people know not how the other half lives finds a rather unique confirmation in the surprise with which, as we venture to say, most persons lately read President Venable's description, in a New York newspaper, of the system on which the greatest university in the South is founded. We there learned that certain measures of university improvement, which are only matters of prophecy at Harvard, Yale and Cornell, have been for nearly fifty years matters of history in Virginia; and that certain other measures were long ago quietly and successfully introduced at Charlottesville by Thomas Jefferson, for the late introduction of which at Cambridge and at Ithaca, President Eliot and President White have been smitten with the epithet of innovators.

The University of Virginia was the dream of Jefferson's earlier life, and the fruition and delight of his old age. When the Declaration of Independence shall be forgotten among the common-places of political achievements, this university will remain as his monument, testifying to his emancipation from prejudice, his knowledge of human nature, and his far-sweeping foresight. He had the choice of constructing a new college in Virginia or of reconstructing an old one. He resolved not to try to cut the new garment out of the old one. He determined to cut it out of whole cloth; and the pattern he found in the amplitude of his own mind. That spacious university, which bears the imperial name of his native State, is the result of his brave and wise determination.

There are half a dozen topics, either of instruction or of discipline, on which our more progressive Northern universities are still doubting, or only timidly experimenting, but which the University of Virginia has long since happily solved. These are the elective system of studies, instruction by lectures as well as thorough recitations, the bestowment of degrees only after rigorous examinations, the abolition of the inquisitorial and police system of government, and the recognition of religious freedom as a right belonging even to such wretches as university students.

Upon all these topics the experience of the University of Virginia throws great light. It is high time that we opened our eyes to it. They have there "the elective system in its broadest sense. There is no prescribed curriculum. The instruction is given in separate and distinct schools. Students are permitted to select the schools to which they are led by their special tastes or proposed pursuits in life." The several advantages, both to pupil and to teacher, of instruction through lectures and text-books are secured by an arrangement which admirably employs both.

But the two subjects of most striking interest in President Venable's testimony relate to worship and to discipline in the University. With regard to the former, he says that "attendance on religious exercises is entirely voluntary. These exercises are held by the resident chaplain, who is not a State officer, but simply the pastor of the Faculty and Students, elected in rotation from the four leading denominations in the State, and supported, as other pastors, by the voluntary contributions of his flock."

And what are the results of this terrible system of religious freedom? They are summed up in these words: "The students contribute with very commendable liberality to the support of the chaplain, who goes constantly in and out among them as their friend and brother, laboring earnestly in the promotion of Christian activity and all good works. There is always a respectable attendance of student worshippers at morning prayers, a good attendance of students in the Sunday services in the chapel as well as in the churches in the town. There is an earnest Christian activity among the students, which employs itself in the different enterprises of the University Young Men's Christian Association. They hold weekly prayer-meetings in the different districts of the institution—the average attendance on which is more than one-third of the whole number of students. They keep up six Sunday-schools in the sparsely settled mountain districts of the neighborhood, five for whites and one for freed-men, with an average attendance on each of thirty pupils. This steady Christian activity is not a thing of to-day or yesterday, but it has been the rule for years."

Finally, the system of discipline adopted in the University of Virginia is one of the noblest features of it. No method of surveillance is employed. Jefferson's maxim about the best government prevails in the institution which he founded. Moreover, the statements "of students in all transactions with the authorities are received as on honor; and in the written examinations each student appends to his answers a certificate on honor that he has received no assistance."

And how does a university contrive to get on with its community of students who are "governed" as little as possible, and who are always and veritably put upon their honor? Nothing could be finer or more cheering than the President's answer to this question. "The effect, of this system," he says, "in imbuing the body of the students with the spirit of truth and candor in giving them the proper scorn for a lie, and in promoting a frank and manly intercourse between the students and professors, cannot be too highly estimated. A student who is known to have been guilty of a violation of his examination pledge, or of any other falsehood in his dealings with the authorities, things of rare occurrence, is not permitted by his fellows to remain in the institution. I believe that if this system of trust and confidence were adopted in all the colleges of the land, it would prove an inestimable blessing to our country in incalculating manliness, truth and integrity upon our future rulers."

President Venable has earned the gratitude of all the people by his admirable contribution to the rightful understanding of college reform. It will be observed that he deals in facts, rather than in conjectures, or prophecies, or hopes, or fears. And one ounce of fact is worth a pound of guess-work—at least!—New York Christian Union. (Henry Ward Beecher's paper.)

Miss Nancy Adams, of Danville, now upwards of seventy years of age, is cutting teeth for the fourth time. This is certainly so, for several ladies have made the examination.
